SUBJECT	Re: The Attorney General’s public records orders

You don't think forty-five years of an attorney general's office reinterpreting the public records statute is worth your time?

By the way, this is very likely true of other states. When you publish orders one at a time, you hide the pattern they can show. I have been digging into the other states - and I have started a project for it - openrecordsamerica.org. I will be looking closely at this.

You and your industry rely on this same law, and I am showing you how it is being interpreted. Why would your office decline to look at something so obviously within its purview?
